wonder how some things come full circle. In the early days of the Internet browsers automatically download links to files that were not web pages like images, PDF files and documents. The browsers then became so advanced that they were able to open almost any file in real time. This created a problem for the developers, however. How do I get my browser to download a file rather than open it? A bunch of hacks and workarounds have sprung up to solve this problem, but none was the true solution. That all changed with HTML5 when the download attribute was introduced. Developers can now add a special download attribute to their HTML anchor tags to tell browsers to view the link as a download rather than opening the target file. There are several different ways to use the download attribute to control how browsers handle download links. What's more, all modern browsers support the download attribute, so you shouldn't see any problems with compatibility or the need for the time to go. There are several different ways that you can handle the attribute of the boot. Each of them has its own benefit and they all run smoothly through different browsers. The easiest way to use a download attribute is to simply incorporate it into your main form in the anchor tag. You don't need to include an additional file name or any supporting information. The result is this: Download the `<lhref=/path/to/download.pdf download=now`. In this case, the browser will download the file in the same way as with the same name. What happens if you really want to change the name. There are many cases where you want to do this. Automatically generated file names are a good example. They usually have ridiculously long names with rows of garbage characters. This is not the experience you want for your visitors. You can standardize things with a download attribute. To provide the name of the file, set a download attribute equal to that. Eliminate file extension. The browser cannot and will not convert the file type, so there is no point in trying. Download now! Along with this comes a simplified way to get your users to download images directly. It's not revolutionary, and you can probably put it together yourself, but you can use the download attribute to create a downloadable image link. Start by setting up the image as usual on your page. This, of course, will be an image that is available for download. The `<img src=/path/to/image.jpg alt=my image>`; then encapsulate it all into an anchor tag, binding with the image image image. `&ta href=/path/to/image.jpg&g;&lt;img alt=my image&g;&lt;/a>`; Наконец, добавьте атрибут загрузки в тег якоря. Вы можете изменить название изображения, если хотите. `&ta &gt;&lt;a /&g;&lt;`; Now that the visitor clicks on the image, they will automatically download it directly from your server. This is not necessary, and it may seem redundant to the developer, but how many visitors to the site would think to click the right image to view or download it? Whenever you decide to make a small purchase on Nintendo 3DS eShop, the device will ask you if you want to download your chosen game right at this point or at a later time. The wording of these options may seem a bit confusing, but it's just asking if you want to start downloading at the very moment (now) or next time you put the Nintendo 3DS in sleep mode (later). It could be more convenient or even necessary, depending on what you are doing with the device at the moment. The Nintendo Download later option is convenient. On the one hand, downloading games in sleep mode is a little easier on the Nintendo 3DS battery. On the other hand, you can queue several games to download. Then you can close the 3DS and make a sandwich. Whenever you want to check the status of your download bursts, all you have to do is open the 3DS.
